KPuVzKjRh33EdhfBHANUJhfiW7vmuqo4nWhW8G.Q: Why do materials with common crystalline structures differ in their hardness (crystallographic lattice)? Why do materials with common crystalline structures differ in their hardness (crystallographic lattice)? The hardness is generally (hypereutectic steel or titanium and most alloys) greater at a particular temperature (e.g. ST_gS) for materials with simple crystal structures and a face centered cubic lattice, than for materials with more complex crystal structures and face centered cubic lattices. Are there any details to the differences in mechanical behavior between these materials? A: While the crystallographic lattice of a material is fixed at the atomic level, the overall crystal structure varies from material to material. As this material changes, so can its hardness. It is common to add Al or other materials to a harder material to make it softer, as adding Al increases the ductility. Take, for example, Nb-Ti alloys. Both are hardening steels, but one is more brittle than the other. The crystallographic lattice of Nb-Ti is face centered cubic, and for most hardening steels it is the primary lattice. NbTi is fabricated from 50/50 steels. As the steel cools and crystallizes, the volume fractions of the individual components alter, so Nb-Ti is often called a hypereutectic steel. As a result, the primary solid solution of Nb and Ti in NbTi has a greater volume fraction of Nb than for pure Nb. The net result is that there is a larger volume fraction of Nb with lower defects (because Nb is harder) than in Nb-Ti.
